The in vitro mineralization potential of human embryonic stem cells (hESCs) under hypoxic and normoxic conditions was investigated. In addition, the effects of a hypoxia mimetic agent, dimethylxalylglycine (DMOG), were assessed on this system. Cells were differentiated into osteoprogenitor cells for 21 days in the presence or absence of 2 mM DMOG and then exposed to normoxic or hypoxic conditions. Bone-related markers were measured by quantitative reverse transcription polymerase chain reaction (RT-PCR) and immunofluorescence analysis. Osteocalcin and alkaline phosphatase gene expression levels were upregulated significantly under hypoxic conditions. Upon differentiation, a switch in osteoblast gene expression levels was observed, in which the expression of genes for cell cycle control and proliferation increased whereas that of genes for osteoblast differentiation decreased. This suggests that the number of cells in the early stages of differentiation increases under hypoxic conditions. Mineralization potential was also enhanced in the hypoxic groups. Additionally, osteopontin (OPN) expression and mineralization were enhanced after exposure to DMOG. hESCs can differentiate into osteoprogenitors in a hypoxic environment. DMOG also enhances mineralization.
