Telephone switching systems such as, for example, private branch exchanges (PBX) and the like, are widely used for effectuating communication between telephone devices, or stations. Although voice communication is generally the primary communication mode implemented through a telephone switching system, other communication services are commonly implemented in such systems. For example, data communication services may be provided through the telephone switching system. These data communication services may include, for example, facsimile services, voice mail systems, and the like. Generally, a computerized telephone switching system may include a network for facilitating communication between a number of such data communication devices. For example, such a network may include a telecommunication network and an associated digital computer. Furthermore, the telephone switching system may also include a signal processor for the communication control of the network. Thus, for example, the processor may generate digital signals for controlling the transmission of signals between various devices. Telephone stations, or telephone devices, are typically connected to the telephone switching system through a connecting arrangement. For example, such a connecting arrangement may include a communication line such as a twisted pair line, or a fiber optic line. Such a telephone station is generally connected to a specific station or line through an interface circuit. A processor generally receives digital signals from the specific telephone station through the interface circuit. The digital signals may include a telephone number of the specific telephone station. The processor may then use this telephone number to access a database which provides stored information as to the capabilities of the specific telephone station. The stored information may include, for example, a memory address for a memory which contains data concerning the telephone station. The data may include, for example, the number and type of peripheral devices available on the telephone station. For example,
