Mission-critical experience (MCE) training is a technique used by militaries, as well as the private sector, to develop skills and knowledge of mission critical employees, specifically those working within the operation of mission-critical systems. It is a computer-based training method in which students operate critical components of a system under simulated, mission-critical conditions. Training scenarios use either a reduced or full-fidelity representation of the systems with the aim of training students how to recognize and respond to system failures and to develop "survivable" problem-solving and "self-healing" solutions in case of system failures. A system under MCE training can be any system that has an impact on the mission of an organization or government. MCE training can be used to train military personnel to defend against cyber-attack and ICS hacking, and can be used to train civilians in banking, finance, utilities, etc. It is also used in private industry to train personnel that operate mission-critical systems in an environment that can simulate all types of failure, from hardware to software. The specific focus is on the operating team's ability to address a problem in a system under MCE training. MCE training works by simulating a problem on a mission-critical system, then presenting it in an MCE training environment, which is an exact, reduced-representation replica of the mission-critical system. The MCE training environment is a highly controlled, safe, and secure setting in which the system's operators, staff, and students are all involved. The MCE training environment simulates all types of failures that could occur in a mission-critical system, and the scenario simulates these failures in an exact, reduced-representation replica of the real mission-critical system. The user experiences the same environment as a real-world operating team in a mission-critical system. All of the critical controls and devices are simulated and act in the exact same manner they would in the real mission-critical system. This high level of immersion allows the users to address and learn from the failure in a safe environment with exact duplicates of the real-world system. The following are major characteristics that distinguish MCE training from other training: • Completely automatic: All failures and corresponding responses are scripted and controlled • Completely safe: All failures are simulated with no physical risk or harm to any of the people involved in the training • High fidelity: The full-fidelity representation of the 1d6a3396d6
